The Wayward Reformers:
Peter Martyr Vermigli and Jan Laski

Among the many shining stars of those God raised up as leaders in the Reformation are a couple of gifted but wayward divines; who had an impact upon the Reformation, but a minimal influence upon their homelands. Peter Martyr Vermigli had to flee the Roman Inquisition in Italy, which wiped out the few Reformed groups who gathered there. Jan Laski (or John A’Lasco) seems to wandered from Reformer to Reformer, but did not begin to minister to his native Poland until just a couple of years before his death.

The Life and Times of Peter Martyr Vermigli

In the mid-sixteenth century, Italian Catholic theologians did not usually receive a warm welcome into the Protestant communion. What is more, we are not accustomed to tracing the origins of Reformed theology to Padua, Naples, and Lucca. But then, few scholars have reckoned with Peter Martyr Vermigli (1499-1562), one of the leading lights from that constellation of theologians who gave formative shape to early Reformed theology. He embodied a rare combination in sixteenth-century Europe -an Italian Roman Catholic theologian who became one of the leading Protestant Reformers of his day. No other theologian of the sixteenth century stood out so prominently in both camps. In his capacity as a Protestant, Vermigli’s sphere of influence extended to some of the major centers of the reformation movement: Bucer’s Strasbourg, Archbishop Cranmer’s Oxford (where he was Regius Professor of Divinity from 1547-1553), and Bullinger’s Zurich. Indeed, his importance was such that one Protestant contemporary, Joseph Justus Scaliger, could say, “the two most excellent theologians of our times are John Calvin and Peter Martyr.” Besides Calvin and a few others, Vermigli has now been recognized as one of the “codifiers” of Reformed theology.

Pietro Martire Vermigli was born in Florence on 8 September 1499, the son of a shoemaker. Little is known of his early years except that he had an abiding affection for the Bible. Reflecting back on his youth in his inaugural speech at Zurich in 1556, Vermigli revealed: “For even from my youth, when I yet lived in Italy, this one thing I minded to follow above all arts and ordinances of men: even chiefly to learn and teach the holy scriptures, neither had I other success than I purposed.” Following this conviction, even though it went against the wishes of his father, Vermigli joined the Lateran Congregation of Canons Regular of St. Augustine in 1514. Academically precocious, the young Florentine was sent to study at the University of Padua, at that time one of the most famous universities in the world. At Padua he lived a dual intellectual existence. On the one hand, he was inundated with Aristotle in the faculty of theology at the University; but on the other hand, he imbibed Renaissance humanism at his monastery, S. Giovanni di Verdara. His years of study at Padua culminated in priestly ordination and a doctorate in theology (1526).

During the Italian phase of his career he was well known as a distinguished theologian, eloquent preacher and a moral reformer. He was the confidante of powerful Prelates under Pope Paul III, probable consultant to the Consilium de emendanda ecclesia of 1537, and was appointed by the reformist cardinal, Gaspero Contarini, to the first delegation to seek reconciliation with the Protestants at the Colloquy of Worms in 1540.

Vermigli’s theological transformation was initiated during his Neapolitan abbacy (1537-1540) by the Spanish reformist, Juan de Valdes. It was in the Valdesian circle in Naples that Vermigli encountered the Italian reformation movement, first read Protestant reformers Martin Bucer and Ulrich Zwingli, and embraced the pivotal doctrine of justification by faith alone. Evidence of his theological reorientation manifested itself during his Priorate in Lucca where, according to Philip McNair, he established “the first and last reformed theological college in pre-Tridentine Italy.” However, the Papal Bull Licit ab initio of July 1542 changed everything. The Roman Inquisition was re instituted under the iron hand of Cardinal Garafa, and Vermigli fled north across the Alps to nascent Protestantism.

Almost immediately after his apostasy in the summer of 1542, he was catapulted into prominence as a biblical scholar and reformed theologian. He was resident theologian in Strasbourg and Zurich, but his nearly six years in England were among the most fruitful of his career. Archbishop Thomas Cranmer appointed Vermigli Regius Professor of Divinity at Oxford University (1547-1553). He single handedly upheld Protestant eucharistic teaching at the famous Oxford Disputation of 1549, consulted with Bishop Hooper in controversy in 1550, assisted Cranmer in the revision of the 1552 Prayer Book, participated in the formulation of the Forty-Two Articles of Religion in 1553, and played a pivotal in writing the ecclesiastical laws of England, the so-called Reformatio Legum Ecclesiasticarum from 1551-1553. He also shocked the Catholic traditionalists by bringing his wife, a former nun, to live with him in the House - a violation of male privilege unheard of in the annals of the university. Vermigli’s name would no doubt have been better remembered today if his sojourn in England had not been cut short by Mary Tudor’s ascension to the throne in 1553. Urged by Cranmer to flee quickly, Peter Martyr fled to Strassburg which would become a center of resistance efforts by English Protestant exiles. His wife had died in childless in 1553, but her remains were ordered exhumed as a heretic from the Christ Church cemetery and tossed on a dunghelp, till 1561. Peter Martyr took the Chair of Hebrew at Zurich in 1556, and there he died, aged 63 on November 12, 1562. Although widely acknowledged as one of the leading theologians of his day, Vermigli fell into virtual obscurity until rediscovered by doctoral students at British universities nearly thirty years ago.
The Wanderings of Jan Laski of Poland

Jan Laski (John Alasco) born 1498, came out of one of the most illustrious families in Poland. (His Uncle, the Primate in Poland was also named John Laski, was noted for his opposition to Luther’s followers.) Destined for the Church, the young Polish noblemen received the best education which the schools of his native land could bestow, and then visited Germany, France, Italy, and Belgium in order to enlarge his studies. At the University of Louvain, finding the air murky with scholasticism, he turned to Zurich, where Ulrich Zwingli urged him to “Search the Scriptures.” At Basel, he met Erasmus. Erasmus was charmed with the grace and genius of Laski who lived about a year (1525) under his roof. Friendships formed at Basle with Farel, Oecolampadius, and Pellicanus who initiated him into the study of the Hebrew Scriptures. His uncle, the primate, hearing that his nephew had fallen into “bad company,” recalled him by urgent letters to Poland, and demanded that he should purge himself by oath from the suspicions of heresy, which he did in 1526. But with his ecclesiastical duties as an Archdeacon in Warsaw and as a Hungarian diplomat he came into close contact with the corruptions of the Papacy, and the need of a radical reform of the Church. He resumed his Bible reading and renewed his correspondence with the Reformers. Two mitres — that of Wesprim in Hungary, and that of Cujavia in Poland — were offered to him. But, frankly and boldly avowing his convictions, he declined them, and left Poland in 1536, uncertain of where to go. In 1537, he met Melanchthon in Leipzig. He married in 1539.

The Countess Regent of East Friesland, Anna, urged him to come and assuming the superintendence of the churches of that province. After long deliberation he went, but the task was a difficult one, the country was a sectarian battleground. All things were in confusion; the churches were full of images, and many of the nobles were dissolute in life, but he persisted. Accusations were carried to the court at Brussels against him, and soon there came an imperial order to expel “the fire-brand” from Friesland. But supported by the Countess, Laski went on steadily in his work. Gradually over six years, the remnants of Romanism were weeded out; images disappeared; and the order and discipline of the Church were reformed on the Genevan model; preparing an asylum for the Protestants of the Netherlands during the evil days that were about to come upon them and paving the way for the appearance of William of Orange.

But it also brought the hostility of the Lutherans. Laski resigned to minister to a single congregation in Emden, the capital of the country. Then Archbishop Cranmer, invited him to take part, along with other distinguished Continental Reformers, in the Reformation of the Church of England. Traversing Brabant and Flanders in disguise, he arrived in London in September 1548 for a six months’ residence with Cranmer, where they became close friends of like mind concerning the Reformation of the Church. After a short visit to Friesland, in 1549, he returned to England, and was nominated by Edward VI. in 1550 as Superintendent of the German, French, and Italian congregations erected in London, numbering between 3,000 and 4,000 persons, and which Cranmer hoped would yet prove a seed of Reformation in the countries from which persecution had driven them. But the death of Edward VI and the accession of Mary suddenly changed the whole aspect of affairs in England. The Friesian Reformer and his congregation embarked at Gravesend on the 15th of September 1553, in the presence of thousands of English Protestants, who crowded the banks of the Thames, and on bended knees supplicated the blessing and protection of Heaven on the wanderers.

Setting sail, their little fleet was scattered by a storm, and John’s ship entered the Danish harbor of Elsinore. Christian III of Denmark, a mild and pious prince, received Laski and his fellow-exiles at first with kindness; but soon their asylum was invaded by Lutheran intolerance. The theologians of the court, Westphal and Bugenhagen, poisoned the king’s mind against the exiles, and they were compelled to put back to stormy seas. This shameful breach of hospitality was repeated at Lubeck, Hamburg, and Rostock kindling indignation of the Churches of Switzerland, and drawing from Calvin an eloquent letter to Laski, in which he gave vent not only to his deep sympathy, and his astonishment “that the barbarity of a Christian people should exceed even the sea in savageness.” Finally, Gustavus Vasa, the reforming monarch of Sweden, extended a cordial welcome to them, but Laski instead tried first Friesland, then Frankfort-on-the-Maine, where he established a Church for the Protestant refugees from Belgium. During his stay at Frankfort, he sought to heal the breach between the Lutheran and the Calvinistic branches of the Reformation. But his efforts although seconded by the Senate of Frankfort and several German princes, were in vain.

In 1555 he dedicated to Sigismund Augustus of Poland a new edition of an account he had formerly published of the foreign Churches in London of which he had acted as superintendent. urging on the king the necessity of a Reformation of the Church of Poland. It is probable that it was this publication that led to his recall to Poland, in 1556, by the king and nobles. Laski was appointed superintendent of all the Reformed Churches of Little Poland, presiding over the Churches of more than half the kingdom He held Synods. He actively assisted in the translation of the first Protestant Bible in Poland. His final goal was the erection of a national Church, Reformed in doctrine on the basis of the Word of God, and constituted in government as similarly to the Churches over which he had presided in London. But with the opposition of the Roman hierarchy; the growth of anti-Trinitarian doctrines, first broached in the secret society of Cracow; and the vacillation of King Sigismund Augustus, the National Synod he envisioned never came about. The king hesitated then refused to convvoke the Synod leaving the work unfinished. In January 1560, Jan Laski died, and was buried with great pomp in the Church of Pintzov. After him there arose in Poland no Reformer of like adaptability and power, nor did the nation ever again enjoy so favorable an opportunity of planting its liberties on a stable foundation by completing its Reformation.
Johannes Laski (Jan a Lasco), Polish reformer

Short biography:

- born around 1499 in Lask, Poland
- studied in Rome after 1513
- 1515 to 1518 studied in Bologna
- 1518 to 1519 studied in Padua
- 1521 deacon in Gnesen and secretary for the King of Poland
- 1524 met Erasmus von Rotterdam in Basel
- 1525 to 1526 lived in Paris
- friendship with Zwingli, Farel, Oekolampad and Camerarius
- 1531 probst of Gnesen and Leczyc
- 1537 met with Melanchthon in Leipzig
- 1538 Archdeacon of Warsaw
- 1526 - 1539 diplomat and politician in Hungary
- 1539 fled Poland for political reasons
- married in Löwen and fled to Emden (Eastern Frisia)
- 1542/43 broke with the old church and turned to Calvinism
- appointed as the first and only Superintendent of all of Frisia in 1543 by Anna of Eastern Frisia
- 1544 founded the church council in Emden and Pastor in Coetus
- 1550 superintendent in London for the international congregation of Dutch, German, French, Wallonians, and Italians
- 1553 fled to Emden through Denmark
- December 3, 1556 arrived in Laskis, Poland
- founded the Reformed church in Poland
- published the Bible in Polish
- died on January 8, 1560 in Pinczow near Cracow
- he avoided all contact to Luther during his lifetime

Thursday October 28 was the first day of a conference in Padua about the Italian Reformer Pietro Martire Vermigil (better known as Peter Martyr), who was born in Florence 500 years ago, and became one of the most erudite scholars of his age, especially in the field of patristics. Interest in Martyr has been increasing steadily since 1949, and his quincentenary is being marked this year by three conferences in all. A 12-volume edition of his works in English translation is also being published. Peter Martyr was a spiritual heavyweight, and scholars are extending their appreciation of his achievements, particularly in relation to Reformation England.

The son of a shoemaker, he made his mark as a Canon Regulator of the Lateran Congregation, occupying key positions of influence in Naples and Lucca, becoming a leader in Italy’s abortive Reformation before an agonising crisis of conscience which compelled him to flee to Zurich and the Protestant camp in the autumn of 1542, at last “free from hypocrisy by the grace of Christ”.

Having married a former nun he was invited to England by Cranmer in 1547, and appointed Regius Professor of Divinity at Oxford and a Canon of Christ Church, where he caused great offence to Catholic traditionalists by bringing his wife to live with him in the House - a violation of male privilege unheard of in the annals of the university.

Martyr’s lectures provoked the disputation of the Lord’s Supper described in Foxe’s “Book of Martyrs.” His judicious commentaries on Scriptures were to remain standard works of reference for generations, and his guiding hand is felt in the Book of Common Prayer and the Thirty-Nine Articles. But his weightiest contribution to the Reformation was his "Defensio." Calvin declared that in it the doctrine of the Eucharist "was crowned by Peter Martyr, who left nothing more to be done".

When Mary Tudor became Queen in 1553, Peter Martyr was allowed to leave England to return to Strasbourg, where he resumed teaching and provided asylum for several of the Marian exiles.

His wife suffered a more gruesome fate. She was a plump and homely soul whose hobby was carving plumstones into curious faces. After eight years of marriage (during which husband and wife must have communicated in Latin), she died childless in the Priory House in February 1553 and was buried in Christ Church Cathedral.

But when Mary came to the throne later that year, Cardinal Pole - who had been Martyr’s contemporary and friend during his time in Padua - commanded the Dean of Christ Church to exhume and eject the carcass of this woman "of abominable memory" because she was buried beside the earthly tabernacle of St Frideswide, Oxford’s 8th century patron saint, and had been the wife of a heretic. Her decaying remains then lay on a dunghill in the Dean’s stableyard for the rest of Mary’s reign. She was reinterred in 1561.

Meanwhile, Peter Martyr took the Chair of Hebrew at Zurich in 1556, and there he died, aged 63, on November 12, 1562.

http://www.banneroftruth.co.uk/articles/peter_martyr.htm

PHILIP MCNAIR

http://blessedhope.simplenet.com/bhisv112.htm